Winner of the 2001 French Human Rights Prize, French-Iranian author Fariba Hachtroudi's English-language debut explores themes as old as time: the crushing effects of totalitarianism and the infinite power of love.

She was known as "Bait 455," the most famous prisoner in a ruthless theological republic. He was one of the colonels closest to the Supreme Commander. When they meet, years later, far from their country of birth, a strange, equivocal relationship develops between them. Both their shared past of suffering and old romantic passions come rushing back accompanied by recollections of the perverse logic of violence that dominated the dictatorship under which they lived.

The Man Who Snapped His Fingers is a novel of ideas, exploring power and memory by an important female writer from a part of the world where female voices are routinely silenced.

By Keryn Stewart

This short novel is vivid and beautifully written. The emotions are clear enough to taste and the story leaves you questioning what you know and don't know about these characters and the world they inhabit. Hachtroudi's use of language and description make the text come alive and her occasional pokes at the fourth-wall help to connect the fiction to the reality.

I would warn that this novel is intense and Hachtroudi does not shy away from brutal descriptions of horrific events. That being said, the brutality braids well into the story.
